Presentation Notes

- Brett Ranon Nachman (College Autism Network | NC State University)
- Presentation Title: Translating Passion to Professional Pathways: Supporting Autistic Community College Students' Career Aspirations
- In light of a presenter scheduling change, Brett stepped in to serve as the main presenter, discussing some of his dissertation research on autistic community college students.
- Brett began by outlining his personal and professional journey as a former autistic community college student himself, utilizing graduate school as a space to more saliently embrace his autism identity and fold it into his scholarship. In recent years, Brett has published eight journal articles (and counting) related to autism and higher education.
- For the context of this presentation, Brett honed in on a piece of his dissertation research, exploring the role of autistic students processing their career aspirations in light of their areas of interest.
- In sharing existent literature, Brett noted the emergence of inquiry into autistic students' career prospects and issues surrounding underemployment.
- Brett drew from Social Cognitive Career Theory to account for the roles of self-efficacy, personal goals, and outcome expectations within autistic students' experiences. He is interested in the factors that influence how autistic individuals view themselves in this space.
- He conducted his study at a community college boasting a longstanding autism program. Brett curated surveys, interviews, observations, written reflections, and documents. For the context of this particular inquiry, he spotlighted 13 autistic student participants.
- Findings centered on how students sought majors that aligned with their interests, processed how extracurricular activities related to their core interests, gained prospects in their intended fields, and projected what their careers could entail. Students drew from resources, including those provided by their families, college, and autism program.
- Brett envisions this work may be insightful for practitioners in informing how they engage in job shadowing, internships, and other professional exposure with students, as well as researchers in the areas of scholarship they explore related to engaging students in professional opportunities.
- This is an emergent area of work, and Brett will be crafting a manuscript around this topic. He welcomed CANVAS participants' ideas and questions.
